The purpose of the Wikipedia article is to educate the general public on the kelp noodle. This noodle can be used as a substitute for pasta and rice in a variety of dishes and nutritional values is especially appealing to dieters. This noodle is increasing in popularity and some restaurants are starting to offer this noodle on their menu. We think that everyone should have access to detailed information on the noodle and how it came about. There is already information on the internet for this noodle but there is not a Wikipedia page where all the different sources can be found on one simple and user friendly page.

We don’t plan on having several sections in this article. We want our page to include simple and concise data for a basic overview of the noodle, its history and origin, detailed nutritional information, different types of dishes it can be used in and the potential impact it will have in the economy as it continues to grow in popularity. We want the page visitors to feel educated without feeling overwhelmed with information. We will lay the basic ground work for the new page with the hope of future additions from other Wikipedia visitors.
